

In this issue of the Annals of Family Medicine

Comprehensive Care Equals Lower Costs 206

Comprehensiveness of care by family physicians is associated with lower Medicare costs.

Unintended Impact of UK Policy Reforms 214

UK primary care reforms for adult care were associated with increased potentially avoidable hospitalizations for children.

Communication Practices and Antibiotics 221

Combining positive/negative treatment recommendations can reduce antibiotic prescribing for children with viral ARTIs.

Repeated Postpartum Depression Screening 228

Mothers who initially screened negative for postpartum depression developed symptoms in the first postpartum year.

Clinic-Level Quality Incentives 235

Clinicians report both collaboration and frustration under a team-based, quality-focused compensation model.

Psychosocial Consequences of False-Positive Mammography 242

Psychosocial consequences among women with false positive mammograms are similar whether the follow-up diagnostic procedure is invasive or non-invasive.

Health IT-Enabled Care Coordination 250

Practices still depend on processes outside of health IT to manage care coordination, even if they have achieved PCMH recognition and participate in the Meaningful Use program.

Recreational Drug Use Among Primary Care Patients 257

Weekend-only drug use frequently progresses into daily use.

SBIRT as a Vital Sign 261

SBIRT is effective in diagnosing and increasing referrals for patients at risk for depression, alcohol, and substance use, but kept-referral-appointment rates are low.

Measuring Physician Performance in an Era of Practice Transformation 264

The interaction between quality/efficiency measures and health care delivery reforms will likely produce multiple views of physician performance.

Discontinue PCMH Evaluation 269

Two physicians in certified medical homes argue that NCQA's PCMH evaluation process should be discontinued.

Practice Transformation vs Improvement 273

A family physician weighs the benefits of practice transformation against hundreds of hours of required exams and certifications.

Presentations of Self in Doctor-Patient Communication 276

Considering doctors and patients as a collection of individual identities can strengthen communication.

One Cold Autumn Day 279

A physician reflects on the limits of his ability to bring about meaningful change in the life of an impassive patient.

Smiling Toothless 282

A physician struggling with the hopelessness of war finds solace and meaning in a patient's smile.