

ease—with functional medicine principles would not be eligible.”

After the literature review in 2014, the COCPD did not find sufficient evidence to support the use of functional medicine in family medicine and, in some cases, determined the claims being made to be potentially dangerous, Jordahl-Iafrato explained.

The commission followed a similar evidence review process in 2016 with the same results, she added.

“The COCPD acknowledged that while sufficient evidence does not exist, patients still may be utilizing or asking about functional medicine; therefore, it’s important for members to be informed on the concept of functional medicine and what patients might be asking about regarding their health care and treatment options,” Jordahl-Iafrato said.

However, she noted, given the current lack of evidence, the COCPD does not deem it appropriate to learn how to practice functional medicine or implement related techniques within an AAFP-certified CME activity.

“The COCPD understands that many family physicians have an interest in functional medicine and we’ll continue to review this topic as more research is done,” Jordahl-Iafrato said. “The AAFP Credit System strives to certify CME that is evidence-based, objective and balanced, which means benefits have been proven and all possible risks, side effects and negative outcomes should be acknowledged.

“Ideally, CME includes fair, balanced consideration of all usual and customary approaches and not only the approach preferred by the CME provider.”

Questions about functional medicine may be submitted to the AAFP Credit System at cmecredit@aafp.org; inquiries on claiming CME credits should be directed to the AAFP’s Member Resource Center at 800-274-2237.
