

In this issue of the Annals of Family Medicine

Resource Referrals for Cardiovascular Disease 486

Primary care practice facilitators played an important role in a population health improvement effort focused on connecting patients to community resources for cardiovascular disease prevention.

Gender in Family Medicine Journal Publication Rates 496

This study examines the evolution over time of female representation on published research articles in 3 high-impact journals geared toward family medicine and explores factors that may contribute to greater gender equity in authorship.

PCMH Activities With Low Spending 503

Of 22 components of a PCMH model, 6 were associated with lower spending or utilization in Medicare's 1st medical home demonstration, the Multi-Payer Advanced Primary Care Practice demonstration (2011-2014).

Potentially Preventable Hospitalization 511

While potentially preventable hospitalizations rates did not change overall in the majority of US counties in 2010-2014, dually eligible, Black, and Hispanic patients continued to have substantially higher PPH rates compared with non-dually eligible and White patients, respectively.

Hearing Loss Screening in Primary Care 520

The EAR-PC study showed for the first time that electronic prompts are effective in increasing referrals for audiologic testing in patients at risk for hearing loss (age 55 and older).

Insurance and Gender-Affirming Hormones 528

Transgender people who lack access to insurance coverage for gender-affirming hormones are more likely to use hormones from sources other than a licensed prescriber, compared with those with insurance coverage.

Financing Buprenorphine Treatment in Primary Care 535

A microsimulation model estimated that offering office-based treatment for opioid use disorder with buprenorphine would be financially sustainable for primary care practices..

Lung Cancer Screening Meta-Analysis 545

Lung cancer screening reduces lung cancer-specific mortality and may reduce all-cause mortality as well.

Medical Aid in Dying and Choice 553

The author provides a perspective on her mother's decision making around medical aid in dying, an important component of health communication, for which little is known.

Giving/Receiving Information in Metastatic Breast Cancer 555

How a diagnosis of metastatic breast cancer was shared and how the patient shared that information with family, friends, and colleagues was a key part of a cancer journey.

What is My Value as a Doctor? 558

A doctor struggles with understanding the value of his work.

Dementia and the Limits of Assessment Tools 561

A physician trained in palliative care explores the experience of dementia from the family's perspective as she navigates the illness in her own mother.